COVERED WAGON DAYS

The trail to Santa Fe led from Missouri a thousand miles across the Great Plains to the Spanish settlements across the Rocky Mountains.

The plains were distances of desolate and barren wastes, mysterious, solitary and unexplored, but swept by masses of living things; shaggy bison, antelope and other game, which appeared and disappeared. Too, the plains were subject to violent storms, cruel frosts and fierce gales, tornadoes and drenching cloudbursts.

The loneliness and emptiness of the plains oppressed both men and women, sometimes to the verge of hysteria. Many became physically ill. Even Coronado's hard-boiled Spanish troopers were terror-stricken by these plains.

In those days, travellers spoke constantly of "making port" and begged Congress to inaugurate navigation laws for what they called the "prairie ocean." Their covered wagons were called "prairie schooners" and were watertight boats mounted on wheels, rising high at prow and stern. The travellers thought of the plains in seafaring terms. They loved the glamor and magic of the sea and called the jumping off place in Missouri, Westport!

In Westport, a company was actually formed to navigate the uncharted plains in wagons rigged with sails and steering gear. Then came a day in 1853 when the surprized citizens of that frontier town were startled at the sight of a light vehicle steering down the street the wind filling its white sail. Women and children fled for safety, horses reared and ran, dogs made for cover and all the male citizens of Westport gazed with awe and open mouths as the strange vehicle came sailing in.

The pilot lowered the sail, locked his brakes, and rolled to a stop before the Yoakum Tavern. While he was disembarking, the amazed citizens gathered to inspect this strange craft and questioned its skipper.

He told them his name was Thomas that he hailed from the East, and that his entire cargo consisted of a compass, a water butt and a carpet bag. He looked like a sea-faring man and they imagined he was tattooed under his leather monkey jacket. They asked him numerous questions but Thomas told very little of himself. He announced that he came as the Navigator of the Prairies, and inquired how many would join with him in forming this new company to engage in the Santa Fe trade!

In Yoakum's Tavern, the leading citizens took a drink or two with him while he explained his plan. Mr. Thomas proposed to build, with their backing a large fleet of prairie clippers to carry the cargo back and forth to the Spaniards. He explained that the advantages of wind power were overwhelming. It meant speed, economy, freedom from buying and feeding draft animals plus the glory of sailing on the high prairies by compass.

Westport was the ideal spot as it was the out-fitting place for all travellers going West; it would be a simple matter to have wagons built there. Indians would be frightened of the strange craft and there would always be a wind to power the craft.

The citizens of Westport were not to be taken in by a clever Yankee. So, they quickly dubbed Thomas the "Windwagon," laughed at his idea of a dry land navy, and allowed none of their money to leave their pockets.

Thomas was not too downcast at their ridicule. "I'll l'arn ye," said he, "I'll sail to Council Grove and back. Then maybe you'll see things my way."

He embarked on his wagon, undaunted, hoisted sail and leaving the bewildered citizens of Westport, he lashed out upon the open prairie, his course lay to the setting sun. It was 150 miles to Council Grove. No one believed he could make it and they laughed at his folly. That was the last of "Windwagon Thomas" thought they.

Nine days had elapsed when wonder of wonders, into port again came sailing Windwagon Thomas bringing with him a letter from a man who managed the blacksmith shop at the Grove. He cast anchor once more before Yoakum's door, walked into the tavern and started talking turkey to the men of Westport.

The men were so convinced that all those who laughed at him before chipped in and financed the building of a super-windwagon. The Overland Navigation Company included among its members and directors Doctor J. W. Parker, a leading physician; Benjamin Newson, the Indian agent; J. J. Mastin, a young lawyer; Henry Sager; Thomas W. Arams, and the inventor, Windwagon himself. It was under his supervision, that the first ship of the plains was built and launched.

The result was an enormous wagon, constructed after the style of a Conestoga prairie schooner. It was twenty-five feet from stem to stern, had a seven-foot beam and was mounted upon four huge wheels, each twelve feet in diameter, with hubs as big as barrels. The sides of the wagon-box, or cabin, rose to the tops of the wheels and above that was the deck. The Craft was rigged like a catboat, with a mast stepped well forward, and carried only a mainsail.

Correct specifications for the steering-gear are lacking but it is certain that the craft was intended to move backwards; that is, the tail-gate was the prow of the ship, and the tongue was brought up and over the stern to serve as tiller. After the vessel was completed, the directors gathered in Yoakum's bar and toasted the craft, then adjourning to witness the inventor's demonstration.

Two huge oxen hauled the contrivance out upon the open prairie, the directors of the Company, with one exception, climbed aboard. Doctor Parker preferred watching the maiden voyage from the hurricane deck of his saddle mule.

Windwagon Thomas, very proud of his importance, took his place on deck, hoisted the mainsail and grasped the helm. The wagon creaked into motion. A strong wind caught the sail and away it went, rolling high over all obstacles, scooting over hill and dale. The passengers were at first amazed, then delighted, and at last frightened at the speed of their craft.

Doctor Parker, who had filled his saddle bag with necessities for all accidents, whipped his mule into action, and lumbered after them. The windwagon made the wagons drawn by oxen seem like snails.

The passengers shut up in the cabin were frightened, they never dreamed there could be anything faster than a horse and buggy. They were too scared to abandon ship and begged the pilot to shorten sail.

But Windwagon Thomas was riding the waves and paid no heed to their demands, steering before the gale. Instead of obeying the directors he began to show his seamanship and yelled down to his helpless partners, "Watch me run her against the wind." He put the helm over and the heavy craft came round grandly.

Suddenly, something went wrong. The wind caught her and in spite of all Windwagon could do, the craft went into reverse. The steering gear locked, and the craft went sailing round in circles. Dr. Parker and his mule narrowly escaped death. The other passengers frightened to death decided to jump out despite the risk, as they were very high above ground. However, they decided to chance it, rather than stay in that idiotic vehicle with its bewildered lug of a sea-captain. One by one they dropped to the ground; fortunately all were safe other than a few bruises and a little shake-up. Nevertheless Windwagon stayed on, determined to go down in the fame of Westport. He remained on the craft and undaunted left Westport, sailing away to shoot buffalo from the after-deck and harpoon redskins while on their cruising ponies.

And so, Windwagon disappeared and the last anyone heard of him was when some Indians found him dead in a valley, where no wind came to fill his sail. They buried his remains and hung his hair on a pony's bridle.

Later men scuttled fearfully across the prairies to the forests of Oregon and the valleys of California.

Even when those plains were settled, women were frightened of that lonesome, wind-bitten land, many women went crazy on those plains.

But not the men—they flourished; they were hard fighting warriors and wanderers and explorers. They loved those plains—it was Utopia to them. A place where they could fight impromptu battles and ride away to fight again some other day.

So Windwagon opened a path through the wind-swept plains, the plains of violence.

We give thanks to those hardy pioneers who developed that wilderness. Not since the days of the Vikings have our pioneer fathers founded such delightful country. We salute Windwagon Thomas for perhaps, without his courage, tenacity and the Wagon we would not have the forests of Oregon or the beautiful valleys of California so accessible today.
